A blog post introduction can be short or long. It should have a hook that captures enough interest to encourage readers to read the rest of the blog post. The introduction should also give readers a sense of what is being discussed in the blog post and why they might want to read it. What blog posts are considered to be introduction posts? These are the posts that introduce a blog or website concept or topic. They are usually titled "breaking it down." This type of post can also include a meta description. It is best to go with this type of title because search engines, such as Google, index this all-important title. The meta description is what appears below the Search Engine Results Page (SERP) title. It is the last thing that users see when searching online for your site. How much text should you include in the intro? As stated by Search Engine Watch, "At most, try to include three or four introductory sentences. These sentences should focus on the value and importance of the blog post and on what they can expect to learn from reading the post. They should also include a call to action (including a link or call-to-action)." For example: "Showing you how to make your own custom design mockups with our free tool. This will save you hours at the end of the project. No more wasting precious time on Photoshop." Bonus tip: If you're posting an intro blog that is part of a larger blog post, then it's recommended that your title clearly highlights that fact, such as "A roundup of tips for creating new content strategy posts with three proven methods. " Remember to always include a link to your blog post in your post content.

Include a Hook Hook

Include a hook so that readers will want to read the rest of the blog post. The hook will draw readers in and provide them with a reason to continue reading. The hook should be strong enough so that it will be remembered, but it shouldn't be too strong that it may force the reader to find you in order to learn more about your site. There are different ways in which you can create a hook for a blog post. One way is to make a promise. This means that you will tell readers what they will learn and how it will benefit them. For example: "This tutorial offers the best advice on how to make sure everyone in your team is on the same page with your content marketing strategy." Another great technique for creating a hook for a blog post is to showcase what the reader will get out of reading it. This can be done by giving out resources (for example: free resources, coupons, tutorials) that proves that the reader won't be disappointed by reading this article.
